SITUATION OVERVIEW

Eight years into the armed conflict, Syria is still one of the largest and most complex crises globally. Over 11 million people are still in need of humanitarian assistance inside Syria, including 5.7 million people who have been displaced, many of them multiple times. In addition, there are over 5.6 million registered Syrian refugees, including 2.6 million children, in a region faced with deepening economic, social, and development challenges. Sustained humanitarian access to people in need inside Syria remains difficult, with 1.1 million people living in UN-designated hard-to-reach areas.

While nearly 1.3 million Syrians, mostly internally displaced, returned home in 2018, an estimated 1.4 million people were newly displaced in the same period, highlighting the continued insecurity in many parts of the country.

IOM continues to provide life-saving and sustaining assistance, integrated protection, and early recovery and resilience support to displaced Syrians and host communities inside Syria and across the region.

In 2019, IOM is appealing to the international community for USD 207,433,291.

IOM will also support inter-agency needs assessment efforts to track displacement and return movements, conduct sector and multisectoral assessments, and monitor humanitarian needs to facilitate evidence-based planning and response inside Syria.

IOM NON-FOOD ITEM DISTRIBUTION TO INTERNALLY DISPLACED SYRIANS

When the conflict in Syria intensified in 2015, Raed and his family found themselves at the center of a deteriorating humanitarian situation in their farming community of Rural Damascus. After the area became besieged, resources became scarce and it was extremely dangerous to move around.

Limited supplies slowly dwindled and days passed without food, causing malnutrition and, in some cases, starvation of community members. In 2018, increased clashes, bombing and shelling campaigns frequently damaged entire neighbourhoods.

"It was literally a burnt land", explained Raed, who suffered an injury to his hands in one of the attacks.

By the time the siege ended in March 2018, Raed and his family had little left but the clothes on their back. They sought safety in a collective shelter before moving to live with relatives.

When the family arrived, an implementing partner, supported by IOM, provided them with essential goods: sponges, blankets, sleeping mats, household utensils and a solar energy lamp, amongst other items.

Despite everything that has happened, Raed's attitude about the future is still positive but he worries about where his family will be able to find permanent safety.

"This support came just when we needed it. No one expected this would happen to us, that's why people didn't think to take long term precautions."

IOM LIVELIHOODS PROGRAMME FOR SYRIAN REFUGEES AND THE HOST COMMUNITY IN TURKEY

Before fleeing Syria, Dara had just begun her career as an interior designer in Damascus. She started a small side business called 'Corners' that aimed to design spaces in people's homes where they could relax and express themselves.

This dream was put on hold when she was forced to flee to Turkey, until being accepted into an IOM-supported entrepreneurship programme at a mobile campus hosted by Gaziantep University. The two-and-a-half-month course trained nearly 100 young entrepreneurs in three cities. Trainees learned valuable skills in design, marketing, fundraising and other business skills. Participants were paired with seasoned professionals who helped them build their enterprises from the ground up. The trainees were Syrian and Turkish, which allowed both communities to make connections and build partnerships.

After completing the training, Dara's team won a grant from IOM to kick-start her company. They used the seed money to invest in materials and advertising. Today, the team of four Syrian interior designers have taken on international clients in Gaziantep and are opening a fourth branch in Istanbul.

"The project does not come only from my experience as a migrant. It was an idea for all people who face daily pressures of life or financial difficulties. It is for every person who feels unrest in the place s/he is in to have his own corner for comfort."

CASH ASSISTANCE FOR SYRIAN REFUGEES IN JORDAN

The conflict in Syria forced Ghenwa and Fadi to flee Homs with their three daughters and two young sons. When they reached Zarqa, Jordan in January 2013, they were frustrated and tired, but they managed to find the strength to overcome the challenges.

They rented a house and enrolled their children in school, trying their best to raise them in a healthy environment. In Homs, Fadi was the owner of a small mini market, but now he struggles with a medical condition that limits his ability to work and provide for his family.

"Sometimes we had to sell our personal blankets for a low price to be able to buy the necessary school items for our children," said Ghenwa, "We are living in a very old house in poor conditions and it's very difficult to pay the rent every month" she added.

IOM provides vouchers to Syrian refugee families in Zarqa, a city with high poverty rates for both Syrians and Jordanians. Thousands of Syrian refugees have received humanitarian support over the years in Jordan including cash assistance to meet basic needs, such as shelter, preparing for winter and buying school materials. The programme prioritizes families with special vulnerabilities - particularly female-headed households or families caring for relatives with disabilities.

"This is the first time we receive extra cash assistance, which will help us a lot. We will buy food and cleaning items, and other things we really need."

IOM LIVELIHOODS PROGRAMME FOR SYRIAN REFUGEES IN IRAQ

Anwar used to run a well-known sweets business in Syria, with branches in Aleppo and Qamishli. When the conflict intensified, his family was forced to leave not only their home, but also their ovens and baking pans behind.

Today they are among the more than 250,000 Syrian refugees living in the Kurdistan Region of Northern Iraq. Last year at the age of 59, Anwar and his two daughters opened a new bakery with big dreams of growing their brand into a renowned sweets company.

IOM provided the family with equipment and business development training, allowing them to establish their first bakery in Darashakran Refugee Camp in June 2018.

As they rebuild their lives, they spend their days baking and supplying local vendors in the camp and nearby areas with delicious sweets. Anwar hopes the profits from their business will support his children to finish their education and achieve their dreams.

"I want to establish my own bakery brand. I want to be competitive, sell more and receive recognition and appreciation for my products. I do this for my children, so they can have a better life."

IOM'S RESPONSE TO FIGHT TUBERCULOSIS IN LEBANON

Hayjan is a 29-year-old Syrian refugee and mother of three currently living in Lebanon and volunteering with a charity assisting children and families. Three months ago, Hayjan become a caretaker for her cousin who was suffering from tuberculosis.

When she told her friends about her relative's illness, they advised her to take the necessary tests as she may have been at high risk for infection. She was not aware about the disease or the availability of free testing and treatment.

Hayjan went to an IOM-supported clinic, run by the National Tuberculosis Programme (NTP), and was diagnosed with TB. As she recovers, she continues to receive treatment from the NTP. IOM has provided her with free follow up testing, transportation and cash assistance. Thankful that she discovered the disease early on, she is now eager to finish her treatment so can return to her community and spread knowledge about TB prevention and treatment methods. Since 2017, this programme has treated nearly 300 Syrian and Palestinian TB patients and reached 120,000 people with TB screening and awareness campaigns.

IOM's Middle East Response (MER) to Fight TB, HIV and Malaria Programme delivers a continuum of care in challenging environments through the provision of essential HIV, tuberculosis and malaria prevention and treatment services to displaced people throughout the region.
