With support from Kuwait, IOM has distributed 5,000 boxes of winter clothes and distribution of another 5,000 boxes of spring clothes is ongoing.

Co-funded by DFID and Kuwait, the clinic attends to a variety of health concerns, including upper respiratory infections, diarrheal and skin diseases, and chronic illnesses. Serious medical cases are referred to hospitals.

Above (©Moafaq Al-Naemi/IOM Iraq, 2017): IOM distributed non-food item kits funded by the Government of Japan to recently displaced Iraqis from Mosul who had arrived in Qayyarah Emergency Site. IDPs usually arrive to the IOM emergency sites with nothing else but the clothes they are wearing. IOM continues to assist newly arrived IDPs with NFI kits.

Stories of Displacement: Ahmed

Ahmed was born in 2006 in Mosul city. His father was a truck driver who spent most of his time on the roads, criss-crossing Iraq's 18 governorates. On the day he was born, Ahmed's father went to Baghdad on a transportation task, but never came back. No one ever heard from him again.

Ahmed's mother tried hard to fill the gap left by her husband's disappearance and lovingly took care of her son, but four years later she passed away, consumed by grief.

Ahmed's grandparents took care of him the best they could and sent him to school despite their limited financial resources. When ISIL took over Mosul, the plummeting financial situation hit Ahmed's family hard.

His grandfather, a daily paid worker, could no longer find job opportunities, and they became desperate. They eventually decided to flee Mosul, as their neighbourhood was heavily damaged by airstrikes and there were no electricity and water supply services; they had to depend on rain water. However, their three attempts to leave the city were unsuccessful and they had no choice but to remain until the Iraqi forces retook their neighbourhood in West Mosul.

Ahmed now lives in Qayyarah Emergency Site with his grandparents. "My only wish is to see my father again," he said.
